Show Your Pupils How to Dramatize!

Show them how to take great historic and literary characters out of their books and make them real. For facts do not live unless they are related to experience.

The plays described below are the work of pupils in a private school in New York City. They will serve as suggestive models for others and they are admirable for presentations on the amateur stage.

SCHOOL PLAYS

1. All's True

Describes a scene in London at the time of Shakespeare, the occasion being in honor of the great dramatist on the first enactment of a new play bearing the above name. A dramatic situation is created by the burning of the Globe Theatre and the destruction of the play. Noted characters from Shakespeare's plays, impersonated by the children, come in before the disconsolate dramatist, and reveal to him how he has charmed, instructed, and inspired all classes, throughout the ages.

2. The Long Road to To-Morrow

Presents the characters of history, introduced by the Spirit of the Past, who shows that there is always progress. Characters are chosen to represent what the present has cast aside, as slavery, religious persecution, etc., and what the future will hold, as humanitarianism, democracy, social justice, etc.

3. A Girl's Dream of Pictures and Painters

Based on a course in Art Appreciation (using University Prints).

Price 20 cents postpaid, for each play

An Ideal Textbook Combination for English Composition

THE CENTURY HANDBOOK OF WRITING

By* GREEVER and JONES

List price $1.84

If ever a book was a convenient tool this is one. The essentials of grammar, diction, spelling, mechanics, and sentence structure are reduced to one hundred articles. Through the use of a simple chart arranged on a decimal plan, these articles are made accessible for instant reference. They are at one's finger tips. Each article begins with a rule, which is illustrated with examples. Every tenth article is a group of longer mixed exercises. By adding an × to the article number written on the margin of a theme, the teacher may assign the needed exercises. Thus themes are quickly and thoroughly corrected and the student is impressed with his error.

RHETORIC AND COMPOSITION

By* ASHLEY H. THORNDIKE

Revised in co-operation with* KATHERINE MORSE

List price $1.25

The weakness of most texts in rhetoric and composition is that they prescribe a certain course which is generally not adapted to the situation at hand. In the "Thorndike" every chapter is brief, presenting the essentials of rhetorical theory on a single topic, written with a view of interesting the student, of illustrating the principles it teaches, and of applying them constantly in his daily work. This division into short chapters gives a flexible arrangement that can readily be changed to suit special needs and conditions. This feature and the revision made last year, make the book thoroughly practical and up to date.

Many teachers think that letter-writing is the easiest and most effective way of teaching a boy or girl how to write clearly, simply, and well. Henry Dwight Sedgwick in the Yale Review says:

> Oddly enough, teachers of literature teach almost anything other than the art of letter-writing. Boys and girls from twelve to twenty are set writing essays, theses, compositions, as if Tom, Dick, Molly, and Polly were going to write essays throughout their lives to their parents, lovers, husbands, wives, children, and old cronies. The evil of it is, that is just what they try to do. They remember what the professor of English approved of in their prize essay on the character of George the Third or on the "harmonious verse sequences" in the "Ode to a Nightingale," and as a consequence letter-writing dies out.

Do you know the method of

CANBY AND OPDYCKE'S GOOD ENGLISH?

It makes the art of letter-writing the basis of consistent practice throughout the book. In every lesson some exercise calls for a letter. The composition is livelier, the exercise is more interesting and personal, the writing is more natural, and the practice makes perfect.
